BOOK 9

SRI KRISHNA

1

I knew that war would never be the final solution. War doesn't resolve conflicts, war doesn't solve problems. In fact, war's bloody massacres generate a terrible fear that mankind may lose all sense of humanity. The danger is that society may collapse altogether. The cultural foundations of a country are sacrificed. The fear is that the enchanting dreams that mankind has cherished generation after generation will shatter. When we are seeking life's central purpose our minds can get overpowered by black doubts and confusions. And yet I had gone ahead and ignited this great war between the Pandavas and the Kauravas. I had started a massive yagna that would consume lakhs and lakhs of soldiers. I had begun a mud-blowing game that would unleash the venom dormant in every person. I had sparked off a horrendous confrontation and clash of the particles that energize the universe. Why? Because I was some sort of nose-beating murderer? Did I desire the destruction of all living creatures on the world? Did I want the whole of Aryavarta to be shrouded with cruelty, disrespect, anarchy, and selfishness? Certainly not.

I lit the fire of the war, I was the one who exhorted back to battle dry-throated Arjuna when, paralysed by compassion for his relatives, he flung aside his Gandiva bow. I took the reins of his Nashighoshha chariot in order to guide his horses. On the third day of the war I violated my promise not to wield arms in battle, but that did not worry me. Why did I do all this? What was my motive? Only to punish Duryodhana and Duhshatana for so grossly wronging pure-charactered Draupadi? To avenge once and for all the wicked political intrigues of Uncle Shakuni? To expose the sweet but ineffective "non-alignment" of Bhishma and Drona? To apply the glossy collyrium of truth in the weeping eyes of Dhritarashtra? To show the path to heaven to misguided, lost and perpetually confused Karu? No. This would have been easy enough. I would have made special efforts to achieve good results. Nor was it a question of establishing two separate kingdoms.
